If you've used the Silkypix conversion toolkit, you may notice that it's very much like Photoshop's Adjustment Layers mode. Elements was the first tool I used on Windows 7 to handle RAW conversion, and I used it to create a tone curve. I know they're very different products, and the list of differences goes on and on. Often, divisions between Adobe and Fuji aren't simply about software – the differences are also due to the hardware sensors that each company produces. I'm sure Adobe is working on algorithms to handle more problematic sensors. They're going to need to get on that before somebody else does. The Fuji X-Trans sensor is no doubt a fascinating development in the world of field photography. It uses a mix of IR and RGB sensors to capture a specific form of light – the light from objects that don't absorb all the light in the visible spectrum. The invisible infrared light helps provide accurate detail to the shadows. That's a big difference since you can clearly see even the finest details in shadows that are totally lost to monochrome camera sensors. The X-Trans RAW support is also proprietary, which is a little annoying. Fujifilm provides a free conversion tool, but there's no guarantee that it will remain free in future versions of Lightroom/Photoshop. That makes it impossible to support the RAW files when you're stuck in the past. So the choice is - the X-Trans RAW file format or the millions of photographers switching to a more modern sensor format.
